About the Course

This course is for qualified therapists and counsellors, who are looking for an opportunity to update their knowledge, gain a higher-level qualification and reflect in-depth on their practice. Teaching will be given via seminars on theory as well as through experiential learning sessions. Students will have the opportunity to integrate new perspectives into their clinical work with ongoing in-house supervision groups. In addition, seminars on contemporary theories will be delivered by experts in the field.

The course is designed to meet the requirements of busy professionals, with the teaching taking place in weekend blocks.

Students will be able to sign up for either the one year Post Graduate Diploma or the two-year MA programme, both of which are validated by Middlesex University.

Course Content Summary

- Two core academic modules which develop students' in-depth knowledge of some of the most significant contemporary theories as well as advancing their understanding of the inter-relationship between theory, their own personal history and their clinical practice.
- Two core practicum (clinical) modules which encourage students' development as ethical integrative practitioners, able to draw on their own capacity to make therapeutic use of the relational encounter.
- Support from a personal tutor.
- Forms of assessment include case studies, client logs, self-reflective accounts, live assessment, a 40-minute presentation and a 15,000-word dissertation.
- The course requires that the student completes a minimum of 60 hours supervised clinical practice with long term clients and 20 hours in-house supervision across the two Practicum modules.

Detailed Course Content

1. Contemporary Theories of Psychotherapy

This module provides the opportunity for students to develop in-depth knowledge of some of the most significant contemporary theories of psychotherapy, including relational psychoanalysis, attachment theory and neuroscience. Students will be able to develop their skills in critically evaluating theoretical concepts and also in critically reflecting on the impact of wider socio-political contexts on therapeutic practice. Students will be supported to reflect on diversity and inequality, social and cultural norms and their own position regarding ethnicity, sexuality, disability, class and gender. This module aims to develop the students' skills in integrating advanced concepts into their clinical practice and being able to articulate their therapeutic interventions from a sophisticated theoretical and research-informed position.

Students will write a 4000 word essay.

2. Personal and Clinical Integration

This module provides the opportunity for students to advance their understanding of the inter-relationship between their knowledge of contemporary psychotherapeutic theories, their own personal history and current life situation, and their clinical practice. Students will be facilitated in developing their understanding of the complexities inherent in therapeutic practice and this will include an examination of their use of self as a means of monitoring ongoing relational processes. Students will also be facilitated in developing their reflexive capacity in order to make productive and effective use of their own self-awareness and insight into therapeutic process. This module aims to produce ethical and effective advanced practitioners with the capacity to hold the paradoxical tension between intrapsychic reality and interpersonal reality.

Students will be assessed on 40 minute presentation of the learning from one or more teaching sessions in this module and a 3000-word clinical example drawn from the student's own practice.

3. Advanced Clinical Practice Practicum 1

This module represents the skills-in-practice component of the course and, in combination with the other modules, is designed to lay the foundations for integrative psychotherapeutic practice. Students will receive a thorough grounding in the key skills and competencies required for effective and ethical practice including: conducting ongoing risk assessments; resolving complex dilemmas; and selecting and justifying appropriate integrative interventions. The aim of this module is to promote the students' development as ethical integrative practitioners who are able to draw on their own capacity for reflexivity to make productive therapeutic use of the relational encounter. Group supervision sessions will be provided during study weekends where students will be facilitated in reflecting in depth on their clinical practice.

The course requires that the student completes a minimum of 60 hours supervised clinical practice with long term clients and 20 hours in-house supervision across the two Practicum modules.

Students will produce

- A portfolio including: clinical hours logs; supervision logs; and a 3000 word critical, self-reflective account of learning from three supervision sessions.
- Attend a review meeting (30 minutes per student) with supervisors and peers.

4. Advanced Clinical Practice Practicum 2

Students will build upon the foundations of integrative psychotherapeutic practice laid down in Practicum 1. In this module students will be facilitated in developing an advanced set of competencies including the abilities to: conduct independent clinical assessments; assess limits to own competence; and demonstrate systematic understanding of key clinical concepts in relation to own practice. The module also aims to enhance students' awareness of the co-created nature of the psychotherapeutic encounter. Group supervision sessions will be provided during study weekends where students will have significant on-going opportunities to reflect on and enhance their clinical skills.

Students will produce a log of clinical hours and a 6000-word case study based on a minimum of 40 hours work with one client. Students will also present a 10-minute segment of a clinical session for Live Assessment.

5. Dissertation Research

Students continuing on the MA programme will undertake further study in research approaches relevant to the field and in research ethics. Students will present a 15,000-word dissertation on a topic of their choice that is relevant to the practice of psychotherapy and counselling and that demonstrates mastery of a complex and specialist topic, critical understanding of research methods and ethical issues and a capacity for sustained critical reflexive awareness. Students will prepare for this by attending research teaching and producing a research proposal for ethical approval. Students will also have access to a dissertation supervisor.

Dissertation topics may cover any area relevant to psychotherapy or counselling including therapist or client experiences, specific groups of clients, specific psychological issues, use of supervision, training. Students may undertake work based exclusively on existing literature or based on fieldwork such as interviews, surveys or observations. In all cases the work must go beyond description to offer reflective and critical discussion, which contributes to knowledge in the field. Students will need to reflect on the link between their own subjectivity and the subject of the dissertation; the implications of the study for their own work and for clinical practice more generally and the links between theoretical concepts and research methods.

Validation

Both the PG Dip and MA are quality assured by Middlesex University.

Assessment

There is one or more formal or 'summative' assessment associated with each module. Assessment methods include essays, portfolios, presentations, reflective accounts, case studies and live assessment of a recorded piece of clinical work, and (for the MA) a 15,000 word dissertation. Support and guidance is given for each assessment.

Assessment is by course tutors, except for the Live Assessment, which is assessed by examiners not teaching on this programme.

In addition to formal assessment of written work, tutors and supervisors assess students' experiential and clinical work.

All marking is moderated and we also have an external examiner to ensure that marking is fair and consistent. You will receive feedback on all formal assessments to support your learning.
